Law School
Dalhousie University

Christian's background in economics taught him tools that inform an approach to problem solving – an approach he will bring to navigating complex legal issues.

He is particularly interested in competition law and looks forward to unpacking the minutiae of an area that is fundamental to our economy.

If you were not a lawyer, what career would you have chosen?

If I were not pursuing law, I might be pursuing a career in merchandising or the like. Merchandising is a curious intersection between fashion and behavioural economics.

What surprised you most about Davies during the interview process?

After each interview, I added practices and areas of interest to my list. Every conversation was exciting.
