Natalie Renner and Robin Schwill Detail First-Ever "Going Concern" Sale of Cannabis Producer in Canadian Lawyer

Davies partners Natalie Renner and Robin Schwill were featured by Canadian Lawyer this week in an article on their facilitation of a "going concern" asset sale of an insolvent cannabis company – a Canadian industry first.

The sale involved a complete transfer of the business, and the issuance of all-important Health Canada licences, to a third party in record time. Part of the "secret sauce" allowing the deal to go through quickly, and as a going concern, Natalie says, was working with Health Canada early in the process to devise a "novel structure" that helped facilitate the sale and issuance of new licences.

The deal could serve as a template for future transactions in the cannabis sector, now going through a period of consolidation. As Robin points out, not only will cannabis companies in similar circumstances see there is a pathway to selling the business as a going concern in an insolvency proceeding, but "Health Canada knows that it has the internal processes to deal with the licence issue."

Adds Natalie: "It opens up options in the context of insolvency and I think generally it's going to produce more competitive processes, as well as save jobs, and keep businesses running as a going concern. It's the type of story we like to see in the insolvency world."
